Contrasting effects of D-allulose administration on enteric nervous system development in the mouse. D-Allulose has been shown to reduce colonic inflammation in mice with experimental colitis. We have shown that D-allulose (50-100 mg/kg/day/mouse) produced an 84-95% inhibition of enteric inflammation in a mouse model of acute colitis induced by administration of 2,4,6-trinitrobenzene sulfonic acid (TNBS) or a dextran sulphate sodium (DSS) solution. We have now examined enteric neural progenitor development in these mice. In the stomach of mouse embryos, neither gangliogenesis nor neuron formation were affected by D-allulose administration during organogenesis. However, when D-allulose (100 mg/kg/day/mouse) was administered during postnatal development, the dorsal vagal complex (DVC) was smaller. We also observed that the final number of neurons forming the myenteric plexus (MP) of the mouse ileum was reduced in the animals treated with D-allulose. This is the first report of D-allulose inducing malform
