Q: How do we add ORM to a standard class library in dotnet core? We have an existing dotnet framework (.net 4) MVC project which uses entity framework to access database. Now we have to turn the class library into a class library for .net core. We have already added the edmx file to the .net core project, now we have a class file in the MVC project which we can access via entity framework. All we want to do is to be able to use the EF model in the class file. That is we want to add orm in class library such that we can access database via the classes in the class library. How do we do this? Any suggestions?

A: You can use EF Core in a project that targets .NET Core, but you will have to reference the .NET Framework assembly for EF in that project. Also, you have to reference the .NET Standard library in the project that uses the EF Core assembly. (Projects that target .NET Standard, or even .NET Core, can reference .NET Framework assemblies.) As you have already seen, you can use Entity Framework in a .NET Core project directly, and you can add an EF Core DbContext to a class library. For your specific scenario, in which the project containing the class library is .NET Framework, it will be necessary to create the EF model inside that project, and then extract it into the class library. You can use the DbContext Generator for this.
